

In this fast paced world, dinner together with your family is one of the time when families have a chance to talk for a few minutes and caught up on the news of the day. Before we were on Wisconsin's no-call list, we were getting 3 to 6 telemarketing calls per week many at dinner time. Many times it would be the same company calling back 2 and 3 times to harass us to give them our business. I neglected to re-new our phone number on the WI no-call list late last summer and the calls started pouring in again. If you change companies for a service or product it's usually for a good reason, so if they can't get your business back in one call as the WI law allows then they really need to look at their business practices and service instead to harassing consumers with repeated calls. The radio, TV, mail and print media is still an effective method for reaching consumers and does not interrupt the family dinner gathering the seems to happen less frequently than most of us would like. The WI No-call list is voluntary to sign up for so it represents people that are tied to the onslaught of nuisance phone calls and it should be our right to request privacy.
